五、閱讀測驗

1. Many people regard animation as more of a computer science than a traditional skill with pencil and paper. The truth is, hand-drawn animation is still used a lot today and these skills are very much needed for computer animation. Just because a person is good at computers does not mean he or she would make a good animator. An animator also needs creativity, the ability to work under pressure, an eye for art, and the ability to draw. Traditional animation is an art that will never die, most would say.

Traditional animation techniques continue to be used today, and many of them have been improved with modern animation. Rotoscoping is where live video is actually drawn onto the top of film with color and animation to create lifelike motion and action into animated characters. Cel animation is still an important concept today, but it is no longer used in the same way. An artist used to have to draw several picture cels and layer them to create movement over top objects that are not moving. Today outlines are scanned into a computer to create "virtual" cels that can be changed electronically to meet any need of a story. Another example of computer-facilitated traditional animation is 3D computer animation. With computer-generated imagery, it is based on live models more than an artist's creativity.

Any artist that is interested in traditional animation is advised to follow the path of traditional schooling in art and computer science. Modern animation is becoming a combination of art and science and is described by Disney as using a very "fancy electronic pencil."

(D) picture cels are layered to create movement

(4) () According to the passage, the phrase fancy electronic pencil refers to the fact that ____.

(A) the Disney makes the best films in the animation industry.

(B) a modern animation is the combination of hand drawing and computer skills.

- (C) any artist interested in traditional animation will end up quitting drawing.
 (D) the electronic devices are so fancy that traditional pencils may disappear.
- (5) () According to the passage, which of the following is NOT true?
- (A) A person with good knowledge of computer science may not make a good animator.
